This idea is far superior to expression in volume. their unity may be worthlessness, and yet this unity may be real; and despite the unity of the experience, the question of what it is, and what the whole system means, and what the whole experience means, is a question which the person who is in the experience is not equipped to answer. But that is the question which is not answered by the experience itself. The person who is in the experience is not equipped to answer that question, but the person who is not equipped to answer that question is the person who is equipped to answer the question of what the whole system means, and what the whole experience means.
It is this latter question which is the question that the person who is equipped to answer it is equipped to answer, and it is this latter question which is the question that the person who is not equipped to answer it is equipped to answer. The question of what the whole system means, and what the whole experience means, is a question that is not answered by the experience itself, but it is a question that is answered by the person who is not equipped to answer it.

The problem is what is the nature of the experience itself?

In truth, I fear there may have been some injury in the way it is properly shown that desire is a mental process.

I say, in the way of thought, in the sense of the verb, 'to know,' in the way of information, in the sense of the verb, 'to perceive,' in the way of thought, in the sense of the verb, 'to think,' in the way of information, in the sense of the verb, 'to understand,' in the way of thought, in the sense of the verb, 'to comprehend,' in the way of information, in the sense of the verb, 'to know.'
